"Looking Backward—What Have I Learned This Year?" (Cont.
VIII-2-209)

BY AMOS H. WELLS.

Some one thing, at least, every one should have learned this year. Indeed, the year has been a poor one unless you have learned many things in it. That is why time is given us to transform it into wisdom. We may grow great without a sudden. The only way to obtain a strong, beautiful character is to develop it year by year.

The first thing one should know about this improvement is that he has made the past year. Journeys are not made by walking in one's steps. A lovely statue does not grow out of the umbilical stalk of the infant if we want to get away from it. If we want to develop a noble character, it must be through a plan, through intelligent system, effort, through diligent, steadily formed, and though steadily recognized results. If we do not know that we have made progress this past year, and in what way, the past year will not have doubled its value still or gone backward.

We should have learned much this past year from our mistakes and failures. Let us look them over carefully in review. A precious lesson lies hid in the heart of every one of them, let us not be content till we have drawn from them all that we can.

And now, having learned these truths from the past year, let us apply what we have learned to the present year, so far as we can find in the past that in order that the coming year may be better and happier than this last year. Let us have faith, though somewhat dimly seen, in God's promises. Let us reach a long arm over the ocean, and, on the first of December, 1905, let us set up a new goal. Make it a great goal, and let us work toward it with the heart and strength in your heart. Forward, March!
